Dear Jim, Michelle and Kevin,

One of the rules of Wikipedia is that nobody is allowed to post false, malicious or harmful material or to promote their own personal interests, viewpoints or agendas. The administrators take such prohibited behaviors and actions very seriously, enough so that you can contact Wikipedia to file a complaint against anyone who posts defamatory, false or malicious information. I would guess that Wikipedia would not only be willing to delete the link to "Free Whitewater" on the "Whitewater, Wisconsin" Wikipedia page, but that they might also be quite willing to give you the name of the person who first posted the link, especially since this person is engaging in the very actions that Wikipedia and it's editors have prohibited.

I would also think that both Wikipedia and whoever hosts the "Free Whitewater" website might be more than happy to provide the name of the person since there may be some legal questions ahead for "John Adams", including possible libel charges and damage to professional reputation. I think consulting a lawyer and providing a lawyer with copies of "John Adams" rants would be the proper starting point.

Tim,

Do you know this to be so and how does one contact Wikipedia? Also, would Wikipedia have information other than a user name such as "John Adams" or "WhitewaterWI"? Can anyone just post a link on Wikipedia?

I would also think that both Wikipedia and whoever hosts the "Free Whitewater" website might be more than happy to provide the name of the person since there may be some legal questions ahead for "John Adams", including possible libel charges and damage to professional reputation. I think consulting a lawyer and providing a lawyer with copies of "John Adams" rants would be the proper starting point.
